

Questions from Robin DeRosa spurred by discussion at the TIDE workshops:

- The enterprising mindset (growth, creativity, empathy): what are the connection points with the humanities? What are the friction points?
- Enterprising mindset summarized as “I can do this and I can make a difference.” How can this mindset support work across majors? How can different majors bring content and values to the table?
- If enterprise starts with What, How, and Why, is it an opportunity for programs outside of Business to provide the What? And inflect the How and the Why?
- Can the 4 courses for the certificate be added to a major (such as Art History) to provide a possible new Option in certain majors?
- Can upper-level courses from certain majors (such as Art History) be inflected to speak to/critique/engage with the enterprising mindset and then be added into the Management option (not just in a huge list of elective possibilities, but as one of a few paired content areas)?
- Can minors be required or highly suggested for the Management Option in order to bring in more of the What content?
- How can TIDE not only serve students outside of BU, but how could it help bring enrollments into the low-enrolled upper-level courses in programs that are struggling to survive, with the idea that if we lose those programs and the depth and expertise in those fields, we will lose the disciplinary diversity that helps our BU majors and university thrive?
- How can TIDE present a model for interdisciplinary collaboration? How does it differ from CAMS? Can we start highlighting the different ways interdisciplinary collaboration is happening in order to make the models more explicit? What parts of TIDE seem truly interdisciplinary, and which could benefit from a more reciprocal or integrated structure?
- Shall we meet again to keep conversation going about how to continue to iterate the TIDE program in order to strengthen other university programs and better serve our students? What next steps would be useful?

If you have notes from this meeting that you would like to post on this resource page, please email them to psu-open@plymouth.edu.